1. A servant leader seems to be a class of people who create leaders, rather than being a leader themselves. In a way they allow people to surpass themselves, making them for of a support person to a developing leader rather than themselves being a leader.

2. Taking from the paragraph that says “Kids don’t fail”....”teachers fail and colleges that turn out teachers who cannot teach fail” referring to the school teachers. I do not agree with this, because certain children refuse to try and learn, although there are the select students that have distinct learning disabilities many of the kids who fail, fail because of their upbringing. I do not believe it’s the teachers fault in these cases, some cases it can be because they cannot find the medium to relate to a student to teach them how they might require. As for the casting out of the teachers, I believe it must be done at times when their methods do not meet the student’s requirements to learn.

3. Discovering Core Ideology:

It says you discover core ideology, you cannot create or set the core ideology. How could this be true when there are so many companies who have started with the same goals they believed in from the beginning? Like Walt Disney, he always felt creativity and happiness was his main ideology and he set that as his goal for his company. This is practically setting his ideology.
